

We know how difficult it is for some businesses to adapt to the challenges of working within the emergency measures currently in place to help combat the spread of Coronavirus.

This virus is reshaping the way we behave and, for businesses in particular, forcing remote working on a worldwide scale never seen before.

IT teams are doing a sterling job keeping their business IT infrastructures going, despite public networks beginning to creak under the additional demand. But we're already seeing reports of an upsurge in rogue activity from cybercriminals who are taking advantage of the situation to mount phishing and scamming attacks and attempt systems breaches to mine for potentially valuable data they can exploit or sell.
